Agriculture Across the Centuries in Augusta County, Virginia*

by
Kenneth E. Koons

The agricultural history of Augusta County must be viewed in the context of its larger regional setting. Because the County lays astride a section of the Upper Shenandoah Valley, historical patterns of agriculture and rural life evident in the Valley as a whole, particularly its upper portion, appear in Augusta County as well.¹

Augusta County's agricultural heritage extends to the first effective settlement by Euro-Americans in the 1730s and 40s.² The earliest farmers of Augusta County—Scots-Irish and Germanic peoples from Pennsylvania as well as settlers of English extraction from east of the Blue Ridge—practiced unspecialized subsistence agriculture. As with pioneers everywhere, the paramount concern of Augusta's first settlers was to secure food and fiber for themselves rather than to produce for the market. Accordingly, they raised a broad range of crops and livestock.

Early farmers of the Shenandoah Valley practiced subsistence farming but they were commercially oriented so that when opportunities presented themselves, they began to produce for extra-regional markets. To the degree that pioneer farmers of the Upper Valley concentrated on any particular market enterprise, it was livestock rather than crop production. In the absence of well developed transportation facilities, livestock could be driven to market.³ After midcentury other opportunities for market production emerged. During the 1760s, for example, the Upper Valley developed into a center for the production of hemp, used for the making of rope.⁴ During the early 1770s, hemp production in Augusta County averaged over 100,000 pounds per year.⁵

¹Throughout this essay and its supporting tables and figures, unless noted otherwise, "the Valley" is defined so as to include the following counties: Frederick, Clark, Shenandoah, Warren, Rockingham, Page, Augusta, Rockbridge, and Botetourt.

²This section on patterns of agriculture in Augusta County during the eighteenth century relies heavily on Robert D. Mitchell, Commercialism and Frontier: Perspectives on the Early Shenandoah Valley (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1977). Especially helpful are Chapters 5 ("Pioneer Economy and External Contacts") and 6 ("Specialization: Agricultural Development").

Despite this early importance of hemp in the local economy, Augusta's longterm future lay in wheat production. Wheat had always been a prominent element of the product mix among early farmers of Augusta County. According to geographer Robert D. Mitchell, Staunton became a regional center for the milling and processing of wheat. Through midcentury, however, most wheaten flour produced in the County was consumed locally. But the French and Indian Wars stimulated demand for flour so that, as with farmers elsewhere in the Valley of Virginia, farmers of Augusta County began to produce surpluses of wheat. As markets for hemp diminished during the decades following the American Revolution, demand for flour continued to rise.⁶ The Wars of the French Revolution and Napoleonic era produced a dramatic expansion in world demand for flour.⁷ Augusta County farmers responded by producing ever greater quantities of wheat, thereby participating in the development of the Shenandoah Valley as a major wheat growing center of the Upper South.

During the last quarter of the eighteenth century, an economic infrastructure for the milling and marketing of wheat and wheaten flour emerged as, gradually, wheat production developed into the mainstay of the Valley farm economy. Mitchell estimates there to have been about 100 grist mills in the Upper Valley at the time of the Revolution (with 13 of them within a five mile radius of Staunton), and about 200 by the end of the century.⁸ By the turn of the century, the Shenandoah Valley had become "the most important wheat and flour-producing region of the entire south."⁹

During the nineteenth century wheat continued as the chief staple of the Shenandoah Valley. Throughout this century, Valley farmers produced a disproportionate share of the Virginia wheat crop. In 1850, for example, farmers of the Valley worked only 9 percent of Virginia's improved acres of land but produced 22 percent of the state's wheat crop.¹⁰ In ¹⁰Unless noted otherwise, all nineteenth-century agricultural production statistics mentioned in the narrative or found in Table 1 and Figures 1, 2, 3, and 4, are from the relevant printed, bound census volumes, as cited fully below: U.S. Department of State, Sixth Census; or, Enumeration of the Inhabitants of the United States, as Corrected at the Department of State in 1840 (Washington, D.C.: Blair and Rives, by Authority of an Act of Congress, Under the Direction of the Secretary of State, 1841); U.S. Census Office, Seventh Census of the United States: 1850. Embracing a Statistical View of Each of the States and Territories, Arranged by Counties, Towns, etc. (Washington: Robert Armstrong, Public Printer, 1853); U.S. Census Office, Population of the United States in 1860; Compiled from the Original Returns of the Ninth Census (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1864); U.S. Census Office, The Statistics of the Population of the United States; Compiled from the Original Returns of the Ninth Census, (June 1, 1870) (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1872); U.S. Census Office, Compendium of the Tenth Census (June 1, 1880). Compiled Pursuant to an Act of Congress Approved August 7, 1882, Revised ed., Part I, Agriculture (Washington: Government Printing Office, 1885); U.S. Department of the Interior, Census Division, Abstract of the Eleventh Census: 1890, Second ed., revised and enlarged (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1896); and U.S. Census Office, Abstracts of the Twelfth Census of the United States, 1900 (Washington D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1902).

this year, wheat production in Augusta County, at over 419,000 bushels, was surpassed by only two other counties in the Commonwealth—Rockingham County, immediately north of Augusta, and Loudoun County, in the northern Piedmont. One historian's comparison of wheat productivity in ten multi-county regions encompassing portions of the states of Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, and Georgia, shows that, in 1850, farmers in a four county portion of the Shenandoah Valley that included Augusta, produced almost twenty bushels of wheat per capita, while farmers of the other nine regions produced fewer than six bushels per capita.¹¹ In 1860, on the eve of the Civil War, although production fell to slightly over 300,000 bushels, Augusta remained the third highest wheat producing county in the Commonwealth of Virginia.

As elsewhere in the Shenandoah Valley, many farmers of Augusta County owned slaves who assisted them in the various tasks associated with agricultural enterprise, especially wheat production. During the antebellum period, the distribution of slaves was highly uneven in the Valley. In Clarke County, for example, at midcentury slaves accounted for nearly half of the total population while in nearby Shenandoah County, they accounted for about 7 percent of the total population. Augusta County lay between these two extremes. There, at midcentury slaves composed about 20 percent of the population, a figure that matches the proportion of slaves in the Valley population as a whole.¹²

During the Civil War the capacity of farmers of the region to produce grain led to the Shenandoah Valley's renown as the "breadbasket of the Confederacy." What about after the Civil War? The Civil War stands as one of the great discontinuities of nineteenth-century agriculture in the Valley. Armies of invasion and occupation stripped the Valley of its agricultural products — whatever foodstuffs and livestock could be used to feed troops. Barns and gristmills were burnt, crops destroyed, and livestock confiscated or killed. Historical evidence of this kind of activity is abundant. Data presented in Table 1 indicate that the Valley's agricultreual economy, including that of Augusta County, suffered enormous devastation during the War. Numbers of all types of livestock as well as crops fell, quite dramatically in some cases.

An informative discussion and analysis of the role of slaves in local farm society may be found in Nancy Sorrells, "Francis McFarland and the Black Community," unpublished paper on deposit at Carrier Library, Special Collections, James Madison University, Harrisonburg, Virginia.

As also shown in Table 1, however, wheat represented an exception – it was the only major field crop for which production actually increased in the Valley during the decade of the War.

^a The agricultural production data for Shenandoah County, as found in the 1870 printed census volume (see note 10), do not seem reliable. Accordingly, in calculating the statistics shown here for the "Shenandoah Valley," data for Shenandoah County have not been included.

In the war torn society of the late 1860s, farmers of the valley continued to rely on wheat as a cash crop in order to earn money to rebuild, and farmers of Augusta County led the way. Whereas farmers in the Valley generally increased their production of wheat by over 7 percent, farmers of Augusta County increased their production of wheat by over 50 percent.

Historical writings about the effects of the Civil War on agriculture in the Valley suggest that the War destroyed the capacity of farmers to produce at higher levels.¹³ This certainly was not the case for wheat, however, for Valley farmers continued to produce wheat in prodigious amounts through the remainder of the century and into the twentieth century as well. During the period from 1870 to 1900, Valley farmers increased their production of wheat by over 1.3 million bushels: from slightly over 2 million bushels in 1850 to over 3.5 million bushels in 1900. To an even greater extent than before, at the end of the century Valley farmers continued to produce a disproportionate share of the state's wheat crop. By 1900, with about 13 percent of the total improved acres in the state, Valley farmers produced almost 40 percent of the state's wheat crop.

All during this last third of the century, Augusta County was a leading wheat-producing county of the Shenandoah Valley. In 1870, 1880, 1890, and 1900—census years for which comparative agricultural production data are available—Augusta County had more acres planted to wheat than any other Valley county, and was the highest wheat-producing county in the Valley. In 1900, with 823,580 bushels of wheat, Augusta's farmers produced nearly a quarter of that year's wheat crop in the Valley, and nearly a tenth of that year's crop in the Commonwealth. In 1880, 1890, and 1900, at 222, 328, and 298 bushels, respectively, the average wheat production per farm in Augusta County was higher than that of any Valley County except Clark. Also, in 1900, farmers of Augusta County devoted a greater proportion of their improved acres to wheat production (24.3 percent), than the farmers of any county of the Valley except Clark (25.0 percent).¹⁴

A prime factor which contributed to farmers' capacity to produce wheat at rapidly accelerating levels during the post-War era was the advent of new mechanical implements and equipment. Until the middle third of the nineteenth century, productivity gains in agriculture resulted largely from new agricultural techniques and more extensive cultivation rather than from labor saving mechanical devices. Until this era, American farmers used basically the same tools as farmers of classical antiquity. Valley farmers, including those of Augusta County, participated in the nineteenth-century mechanical revolution in agriculture by investing in expensive, horse-powered (and thus labor-saving) mechanical implements such as grain drills for the sowing of wheat, reapers for the harvesting of wheat, threshers for separating grains of wheat from their stalks, and wheat fans for separating wheat from the chaff. By the 1880s, many farmers employed steam power (rather than horse) to drive mechanical threshers.¹⁵

Although farmers of Augusta County grew wheat as their principal crop, it was not grown to the exclusion of other crops. Farmers concentrated on the production of wheat, but they did so within the context of what human geographers refer to as general, mixed agriculture. Wheat was only one crop grown in a system of agriculture in which farmers grew a wide array of crops and raised a variety of domesticated farm animals, much as they had since initial settlement. As indicated above, even in counties of the Valley where wheat production was most intense, e.g., Augusta County, only about 25 percent of the improved acres were devoted to wheat production, leaving 70 or 75 percent of the remaining arable land for growing crops other than wheat. Corn was the principal secondary crop. Other principal field crops cultivated included oats, rye, barley, and various artificial grasses. These crops provided foodstuffs for human consumption as well as grain, fodder, and pasturage for livestock. The types of livestock kept by farmers of nineteenth-century Augusta ¹⁴These extraordinary levels of wheat production were achieved despite a secular trend of decline in the price of wheat all during the latter third of the nineteenth century. Excellent discussion and analysis of this may be found in Richard K. MacMaster, Augusta County History, 1865-1950 (Salem, West Virginia: Don Mills, Inc., for the Augusta County Historical Society, 1988), pp. 99-100 and 102-103. Data on prices of wheat during the nineteenth century may be found in Arthur G. Peterson, Historical Study of Prices Received by Producers of Farm Products in Virginia, 1801-1927 (Blacksburg, Virginia: Virginia Polytechnical Institute Agricultural Experiment Station, in cooperation with the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture, 1929).

¹⁵MacMaster, pp. 100-102, discusses the advent and spread of mechanization on farms of Augusta County during the latter half of the nineteenth century. The diaries and account books of A.H. McCue (Virginia Historical Society, Richmond), contain evidence of the gradual process of mechanization on a farm in east-central Augusta County (near Fishersville) during this period.

County included horses, cattle, swine, and sheep. Horses served as draft animals, while cattle provided meat and dairy products. Swine were ubiquitous and served as a main source of animal protein, while sheep were valued mainly for their wool.¹⁶

Regional emphasis on the production of wheat within a system of general, mixed farming continued into the twentieth century until the decade of the 1940s (Figures 1 and 2).¹⁷ As during the nineteenth century, Augusta County remained a leading wheat producing county of the Valley. In each of the census years 1910, 1920, 1930, and 1940, Augusta's farmers devoted more acres to wheat production than the farmers of any Valley County. Also, except in 1930 when Augusta's production of wheat was exceeded by Rockingham's, Augusta County outproduced all other Valley counties, quite substantially in a number of instances. In 1920, for example, Augusta County was the only county in the Valley in which wheat production exceeded one million bushels.

¹⁶The McCue diaries and account books provide richly detailed information about mixed, general farming with an emphasis on wheat, in east-central Augusta County during the last third of the nineteenth century. An interesting account of practices relating to sheep husbandry during the 1850s, authored by Augusta County farmer S.F. Christian, may be found in Southern Planter, XVI (February 1856), pp. 45-47.

¹⁷Unless noted otherwise, all post-1900 agricultural production data cited here are from Virginia Crop Reporting Service, "County Farm Statistics" (Richmond: Virginia Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services, 1982). The twentieth-century data, although shown as pertaining to years ending in zero, pertain actually to each previous year (years ending with the digit nine). For the sake of consistency with nineteenth-century data, I have labelled the data as pertaining to years ending with zero. (In this regard, it is also worth mentioning that nineteenth-century agricultural data were collected during years ending with zero, but the data pertain to the previous crop year).

During the 1940s, a fundamental shift in the nature of the agricultural economy of Augusta County occurred (Figure 2). A mechanical revolution (epitomized by the widespread adoption of tractors), a biological revolution (e.g., hybridization of plants and animals), and a chemical revolution (pesticides and herbicides) combined to produce a new agricultural economy in Augusta County and the Valley at large, one based on grass farming and livestock production.¹⁸ Farmers abandoned wheat as a cash crop and turned increasingly to the production of sheep, cattle, and poultry (Figures 3 and 4).

This shift, in turn, created a land-use revolution that altered the rural landscape of Augusta County in highly visible ways. For greater than a century, farmers subjected their improved lands to the annual round of tillage required for production of wheat and other field crops. The seasonal rhythms of sowing and harvesting a broad array of crops created variety in the appearance of the landscape. Although present-day farmers of Augusta County have not abandoned tillage agriculture altogether, in the last half century the trend among farmers has been to convert large acreages to the production of permanent grasses so that, now, large expanses of pasture lands for the grazing of cattle dominate rural vistas. Also, in recent years the built landscape of Augusta County's rural settings has come to include highly visible, long, rectangular, shiny metal buildings where industrial methods are used for the large-scale production of poultry.

Whereas diversity of product mix has been a central feature of farming as it was traditionally practiced across the centuries in Augusta County, the modernization of agriculture that occurred in the mid-to-late twentieth century has resulted in increasing specialization of production. For most of the history of Augusta County, however—from the era of the American Revolution until the World War II era—the primacy of wheat production in the regional farm economy has been a major element of continuity in the agricultural history of Augusta County and the Valley of Virginia.

¹⁸These are national developments discussed in standard surveys of the history of American agriculture. Especially recommended are John T. Schlebeker, Whereby We Thrive: A History of American Agriculture, 1607-1972 (Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1975), and R. Douglas Hurt, American Agriculture: A Brief History (Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1994).

McKinley, Virginia*

One Hundred Years in Augusta County

1896-1996

by
Irvin Rosen

A short time ago someone asked me how long I had lived in McKinley. I told them I could not remember when I did not, that I was born here in 1915 and three weeks ago I had a birthday then one week later my wife had a birthday. We both are 81.

One hundred years ago, in 1896, there was a very small general store, two churches and five homes here. A very small village. William McKinley was campaigning for the office of president of the United States. He won.

Money was scarce and times bad (my father told me) so one of the first projects Mr. McKinley sponsored was to establish Post Offices at every small village. McKinley was named for him and I am told that it is the only village in the state that is named for a national president while in office. This is one of 86 post offices in Augusta County at that time. Now there are less than 30.

The small general store owned by Mr. Robert Arehart at that time was also the McKinley Post Office. He was the post master until my father and mother (Finley and Sally and a daughter Ethel) bought the Store and Log house in 1902. My sister Evelyn was born in the log house. The post office was closed in 1908. My father was glad because he wanted to do carpenter work full time again. He sold the store building and log house and built a new home nearby. (I was born in the new house).

*Presented at the fall meeting of the society held at McKinley.

Up to this time this area was called Gravley Hills, because of the very rocky soil. You can find large piles of rocks on many farms here today. Now the name was changed to McKinley. The altitude here is 2200 ft. above sea level compared to 1495 ft., at Staunton (at the C & O depot). Several rivers start here and that is the reason we are in Riverheads District of Augusta County.

The first Church was a union Church, used by three denominations; the United Brethren, Lutheran and German Reformed. This log Church built in 1842 was destroyed by fire c 1870. The United Brethren built a new church here, the Lutherans went nearby and built a brick church in 1872 named St. Marks, (now named Redeemer) the German Reformed we do not know.

In 1902 this present Church was built with the leadership of C.S. Yeago. The name has been changed to McKinley United Methodist. Many of the family names still live on Sensabaugh, Arehart, Reed, Miller, Clemmer, Cason, Rosen, Golliday, Craig, Lucas, Whitesell, Wade, Spitler, Runkle, Patterson, Grimm, Buchanan and Yeago.

We thank the Augusta County Historical Society for bringing this meeting to McKinley and helping us celebrate our 100th birthday. A special thanks to: Nancy Sorrells, Joe Nutt and Ann McCleary.

The Joy of Local History*

by
Katharine L. Brown

You and I are ordinary persons, and our experiences are a "passage through time of ordinary mortal dimensions." We are mostly not the stuff of which statesmen, diplomats, and heroes are made. That does not mean that our lives, and those of our predecessors here in Augusta County are not the stuff out of which history is made. We ARE the raw material of history. So are our parents, grandparents, great-grandparents, their friends, co-workers, ministers, and handymen.

The stories of microcosms such as Augusta County and the ordinary mortals who create and inhabit them make wonderful, exciting history. But sometimes, we may think of local history as "second class" history. We may believe that the really important history occurs in Washington, Beijing, or Paris, or on Civil War battlefields.

I don't think for one moment that local history is second class history. I simply think that historians were a little slow to recognize it as important. Most of us have grown up with a political creed, democracy, that exalts the value of the rights and political opinions of the individual citizen. Most of us have also grown up with a religious creed in the Judaeo-Christian tradition, which values the individual soul as a unique creation of the Almighty.

Yet, where we have subscribed to the equality of individual citizens and individual souls, we have been slow to accept the experiences of ordinary individuals in everyday localities in the past as significant in history. Our academic understanding has lagged behind our political creed and our theology.

We learned early that the really important things about history were the deeds of that group we might call "great white men." The mortals who inhabited our childhood texts were kings, princes, presidents, and generals. Common white folk, minority or racial groups, women and children were simply not interesting subjects for historical study. And why not? Because they were not in positions of sufficient power to make a difference. "Real" history was about the POWER. Power was demonstrated on battlefields, in the halls of Congress, in corporate headquarters or around diplomatic tables. Important events did not occur in kitchens, farm fields, sweat shops, factories, or in the shops, churches, or schools of small towns.

The new social history of the past two decades challenged that idea, and made a place for a serious study of local history. I want to look at the fun side of local history – the field that I spend much of my professional life researching, writing, and teaching, mostly at museums. It has been a joy for me to have had the opportunity to influence the way history is interpreted to everyday Americans and foreign visitors at three excellent local museums – the Stonewall Jackson House, the Woodrow Wilson Birthplace, and the Frontier Culture Museum.

Local history is more than a job or a career. It is a hobby, an avocation, and a passion. I would like to share that fun side of it with you this evening. When the Frontier Museum closed for the first week in January, I found an incredibly cheap flight to London and settled in for a research feast. On returning, someone asked me, "How was your trip to London?" I babbled on about my research in the manuscripts at the British Library, and in the papers of the Bishop of London at Lambeth Palace. He listened politely, then asked "Did you do anything that was fun?"

It was fun! Working in the rare manuscripts room of the British Museum where some of the most beautiful medieval manuscripts, and papers of kings, queens, and prime ministers are saved was fun! Stumbling across a collection of letters to British officers written from the Shenandoah Valley during the French and Indian War was exciting! Finding letters in that collection written from an ancestor stationed in Winchester during that War was a delightful surprise!

My world is filled with persons no longer among the living, but whose lives are so interesting to me that I feel as if I really have known them. That interest in the past was piqued by my first visit to Williamsburg in 1948. That was total enchantment, and the beginning of a life-long love affair with the 18th century and with historic buildings. Each return to Williamsburg is nearly as wonderful as that first visit. I hope that our own living history experiment at the Frontier Culture Museum captures the imagination of hundreds of the youngsters in that same way, and will make them want to know more about the historic cultures interpreted there that are so important to the understanding of this part of Virginia.

It was my great good fortune to grow up in a four generation household until I was in high school. To live in a rambling Victorian house built by my great-great grandfather in 1878, and that was also inhabited by a cook and a houseman of great age, whose parents had been slaves was an adventure and a privilege. I remember my great-grandmother, born in 1859, telling me about being carried on her father's shoulders to see Lincoln's funeral train come through town.

My first attempt at researching history was recorded in a pocket diary found in the attic. I came upon it again, packed among childhood treasures. My childish effort was an interview with my great-grandmother in 1951. I was trying to get her to tell me about her husband's eight siblings in Clarke County, in the Lower Shenandoah Valley. Some were killed in the Civil War, and one moved to Mexico rather than live under Yankee rule. Those notes I took are a sorry lot—what I would give to be able to talk to her today! This is not to make a big deal of my family. My point is to remind you that early childhood contacts leave a strong impression on children. My plea to each and every one of you is to use your golden opportunity to pass the story of your family along to your children and especially to your grandchildren or your great nieces and great nephews.

Every family has an interesting story. I learned that when I was a young and inexperienced teacher in the sixties. When Madison and I were first married, he was the advisor to a fraternity in Pennsylvania which sponsored an annual lecture for the university. The chapter had engaged a man to lecture about his family history research. As the "adult advisors," Madison and I were invited to have dinner with the speaker. I was fascinated with his project and thought that it might be used in the classroom. His book appeared the next year. His name was Alex Hailey, and the book was Roots.

A couple of years later in St. Louis, I was teaching at a community college whose student body was 50% blue collar descendants of European immigrants, and 50% descendants of African-Americans who had migrated north to work in war industries. Few cared for history. They took my American Civilization course only because it was a state requirement for their vocational certificate. History writing and teaching rarely related to them or their experience. Remembering Alex Hailey's work, I abandoned the traditional term paper on sleep-inducing topics such as "Causes of the American Involvement in World War I." Instead, I asked them each to research and write how events such as the Great Depression or World War II affected their family or a neighbor family they "adopted." A few resisted this, proclaiming that their family's business was none of my business. But, they did the assignment. The finished papers blew me away. Many students admitted that they had never thought of asking their grandparents and parents about the family's experiences. The stories of these ordinary people living out their ordinary lives were extremely moving and very interesting.

The experiences of sharecroppers picking cotton in Mississippi and living in dogtrot shacks, then deciding to move north to seek city jobs were stories of true endurance. One student wrote of her Swiss grandmother's youth as a maid for a St. Louis industrialist's family, and of the humiliation of carrying the silver chest up to the lady's bedroom every night, and waiting while each piece of flatware was counted out to be sure that the servants had not stolen any. These are valid ventures into local history in that community. They are rich with human interest. They tell much that is not in textbooks, but that gives us a sense of life in a bygone time.

There are endless adventures and enchanting moments for anyone doing local history. Local history does not require an advanced degree or a trip to the Library of Congress or the National Archives. Local history can be done in our court houses. Reading the old deeds, or wills, or estate inventories, or court order books for the early years of Augusta County is fascinating. If you don't believe me, just ask Katherine Bushman—she has read every one of them! The manuscript collections at UVA, W&L, and JMU have letters and diaries from all kinds of fascinating folk from Augusta County. Try your hand at this sometime! Local history can be done by interviewing local people, and writing up the interview. The Augusta County Historical Society is to be commended for sponsoring an oral history workshop, and acquiring the equipment to enable local people to carry out oral history interviews. This is a resource that each and every one of you can use. Please do!

My first "hands-on" venture in Virginia local history came twenty years ago when we moved to Lexington. I had time on my hands and no job prospects. A kind clergyman/professor knew I was bored, and sensed that I might be the person to carry out a project for a history of the Episcopal Church in Southwestern Virginia. It was the most wonderful way to learn this part of the state. I find it hard to write about places I have never seen, so I set out to visit each of the 50 churches from Staunton to Big Stone Gap. We decided to fit the Tazewell church into a trip to collect our two boys and their friend at church camp at Hungry Mother State Park at Marion. The ride on a twisting dirt road over the mountain to Tazewell was a real taste of southwestern Virginia. By the time we reached Tazewell, the children's stomachs were so churned that we let them out of the car and they all promptly threw up. They gave their all, or at least their lunch, for the cause of local history.

Another time, I was possessed to see a long-abandoned Gothic chapel in a remote rural area outside of Lynchburg. We headed there one hot July day - I was 8 months pregnant. We found the building locked and overgrown with weeds. I was determined to see the window over the altar, reputedly a memorial to a young minister killed in a buggy accident in the 1880s. That required hoisting my bulk up onto a window sill in a most unladylike fashion. We accomplished the goal, read the inscription, and felt a real sense of sadness at the tragic event on a country road a century ago that took a young man's life, and left a congregation with no shepherd.

My excursions into Irish local history have been a joy. Until a dozen years ago, I knew nothing about Ireland or Irish history, and cared even less. A brief business trip there left me fascinated with the land and curious to learn more. The path I chose to that knowledge was to track one of the few immigrants swinging from my family tree who had emigrated from Ireland. He left Ireland in 1720 and settled on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. The only thing I knew was that his father was a clergyman in the Church of Ireland-luckily. This became a superb detective game that filled evenings and weekends on this side of the water and a year's worth of them when I was in Ireland on a fellowship.

Clues to this emigrant's family turned up in the clerk's handwriting on the vellum pages of giant books of deed memorials. I perched on the upper rung of a ladder and dragged these tomes down from high shelves in the top floor of the 18th century Registry of Deeds building in Dublin—it looked like something out of a Dickens novel. I needed to understand their context. This caused me to read many books on Irish history, and pore over maps, and prow through museums. It sent me walking the streets of Dublin to find buildings surviving from the early 18th century. These included the church where that long ago ancestor was rector—abandoned and sold to house an artists' co-operative when I first saw it. The handsome box pews had been ripped out. Where the altar had stood, there hung a huge painting of a nude male. When Nancy Sorrells and I were in Dublin last year, we visited the church. The once-handsome Baroque church had changed hands again, was much spiffed up, and was now a retail store for paints and wallpaper.

I went out to the tiny village in County Carlow where my immigrant ancestor had grown up at the turn of the 18th century, when his father was dean of an ancient Irish cathedral nearby. The village church was in ruins, with only the tower remaining, the cemetery where my family probably lies was lost under weeds, and the gate locked. But there was a little house by the gate, and the woman who lived there came out to see if she could help me. I explained my mission. She invited me into her cottage where a kettle boiled over the turf fire, made me a cup of tea, and we chatted. She was following in the footsteps of her father and grandfather who had been sextons for the church while it still stood, and she did what she could to maintain the grounds. I've been back to visit Olive several times. We exchange Christmas cards, and each time I'm there, it is a satisfying experience to stand on that hilltop by the old ruins, look over the river Barrow, see the 12th century bridge and the ruins of the castle in the town and know that my own flesh and blood nine generations ago stood in that same spot and saw much the same sight in that sad and beautiful land.

My other project in Ireland was also local history. I am intrigued with the Anglo-Irish poet and hymnwriter, Cecil Frances Alexander. Her name is not a household word, but most of you know some of her hymns—All Things Bright and Beautiful, Jesus Calls Us O'er the Tumult, There is a Green Hill Far Away, Once in Royal David's City. I decided to research her life and work, and learn her mid-19th century Ireland—a different Ireland from that of my late 17th and early 18th century family history project. But the techniques are the same. The adventures were great. All my friends in Ireland and all my relatives and friends who visited me there were pressed into service on a research expedition.

At Rathmullan in Donegal I wanted to visit a country house where Mrs. Alexander had stayed and written a poem. Fortunately, it is now a luxury hotel and accessible to the public. Two friends and I had a lovely afternoon tea in the parlor and imagined Fanny doing the same thing a century and a quarter earlier. I wanted to learn more about the family she had visited, who were long dead. My Irish friends asked around a bit, and was advised to go to the White Stag pub and ask for Harry. When we arrived, Harry's wife was tending bar, and was not so forthcoming. We sipped our Guinness slowly, and when she went out back for a break, Harry appeared and gladly told us what he knew about that gentry family. He said we really should talk with Annie Sheridan who had been a maid at the country house in the 1930's. He told us where to find her, and then said "You'd better hurry, she always goes to 7 o'clock mass, and its 10 to seven now." We arrived in time to see her get in a car and head for church. We went to mass, then came by her house, knocked on the door, said Harry sent us. She invited us in, offered us a glass of sherry, showed us the university graduation photo of her grandson. Then she told us all about being first a maid and then a cook for this "faded gentry" family in the 1930s, when the elderly spinster ladies who had been children when Fanny Alexander visited, were collecting eggs on their once-grand estate and selling them in the village to make ends meet.

I was possessed to see Ballykeane, the house in County Wicklow where Fanny spent her childhood. It was a stud farm in private hands. I could not have found it if my life depended on it. But I did not have to risk my life. A good turn I did someone ended up earning me access to Ballykeane. Our youngest son was in a boarding school in Dublin the year I was in Belfast. One day, he had phoned to ask if I would do a big favor for his friend Philip. Philip wanted a special tent with his birthday money. It was only available in a British store that had no outlet in the Republic. Would I please buy the tent for Philip in Belfast and bring it to Dublin the next time I came? I'm an easy pushover, so I said "sure." Bought the fool tent, dragged the thing on a train to Dublin, hauled it around the city to the Irish Department of Agriculture building, where I deposited it with a stranger who was a deputy commissioner there, and who could get it down to Philip's family who farmed near the village of Tinahely in County Wicklow. His mother phoned me in Belfast to say a big thanks and that she wished she could do me a good turn.

Are you surprised that months later, when I needed to see Ballykeane farm somewhere in County Wicklow, I phoned Philip's mother for help?! It turned out that Philip's father was cousin to the former owner of Ballykeane. Unfortunately, the cousin had been killed in a horse box accident, but Philip's parents had some acquaintance with the Swedish couple who had bought the stud farm, and would arrange for me to visit. She put me in touch with another cousin who took me to Ballykeane, and to her own house wedged between a 12th century Norman Castle ruin and the parish church where Fanny grew up. She also took me to the ruins of a grand Georgian house in the Wicklow hills that was much like our Westover on the James, where Fanny had often visited as a child. These encounters enriched my understanding of my subject, Fanny Alexander, but also helped me to understand rural Ireland, and the tensions between the majority native Irish Catholic population, and the minority Anglo-Irish Protestant ruling class. It was only possible through the kindness of local people who appreciate the fact that someone is interested in the story of their place and their people.

The road through County Wicklow is not always strewn with rose petals. When I was driving Nancy around in Wicklow last year in our miniature rental car to visit descendants of connections of Fanny's family, we saw from time to time a quaint phrase on their road signs: "Beware, Road may subside." We weren't exactly sure what that meant. We learned the way all fools do—experience. The road "subsided" altogether, and we found ourselves making a very intimate acquaintance with a tall, mean hedgegrow. Our tire was punctured and the rim whacked out of shape. We had to get two men away from watching the finals of the all-Ireland hurling match on the telly to help us change the tire. (That's kinda like dropping in on strangers on Super Bowl Sunday). A passing motorist even called the rescue squad. What can I say—it was a local history adventure.

One day in 1995, a letter appeared in my mailbox at the Museum from a 90 year old farmer in Maghera, County Londonderry, named Sam Shiels. He inquired about the Ulster turnip planter he had donated to the Museum years ago, and asked incidentally, if we were familiar with Staunton's first Presbyterian minister, who had come from Maghera, John Glendy. My first reaction was "John who?" Can the old gentleman be confused? I ran the name by some Presbyterians, and they seemed as bewildered as I. Here was some local history that needed investigation! We worked on him a bit, and little by little, squeezed some very interesting information out of church records and county records and Augusta County's walking encyclopedia, Katherine Bushman. Out went feelers to a family historian in Tidewater, and back came a long phone call and some great family stuff. The University of Virginia had a rare publication that Glendy issued in Staunton. The circle spread wider, as I hooked up with a church in Baltimore, with the Maryland Historical Society, and the curatorial office of the United States Senate. Piece by piece, Glendy's life in Virginia and Maryland fell into place, and was very interesting. I'm not going to say a word about it—that is part of my talk tomorrow night at the Museum, so if curiosity is killing you, you'll have to come out again!

What was missing was the story of his life in Ireland. Nancy and I had already woven Glendy into the paper we have on the social and economic aspirations of Presbyterian ministers at a conference in Northern Ireland. What better opportunity than to do some research on him over there, before he emigrated to Virginia. We were delighted to find Glendy documents on the huge emigration database at the Ulster American Folk Park. Then the kindly old farmer, Sam Shiels, comes back into the picture. We visited him in the rambling stone farmhouse at Maghera that his family has occupied for a couple of centuries. We climbed all around the ancient church ruins and cemetery on the hill above his farm and visited the Presbyterian Church built to replace Glendy's church which the British army burnt down when he was suspected of revolutionary insurgency in 1798. John Glendy came very much alive in this whole process on both sides of the Atlantic. A simple question from an old man set us on a wonderful chase, and brought us new understanding of a part of Staunton's and Augusta County's past.

This year, as we all know, Staunton is celebrating the 250th anniversary of its founding. I help with a committee for the birthday that decided to undertake and encourage the writings of parts of Staunton's past for the newspaper. In the 16 years I've lived here, I've heard many many questions about why the city is called Staunton, and why it is pronounced so peculiarly? , and who was Lady Rebecca Staunton anyhow? So, I decided to find out. The project has absorbed most of my spare time since November. This is a small part of local history that can be writ large. This lady, wife of our royal governor, William Gooch, who played such an important role in opening up the Valley of Virginia for settlement, links us to the wider world of the British Empire to our capital in Williamsburg, to imperial politics, and to our rich heritage from England. I've chased Lady Rebecca all over Virginia and back across the Atlantic. I found her birth record and that of her siblings in the Mormon family history center in Charlottesville. I read a dissertation about her husband in order to milk out the drops of information about her. I've found a couple of letters from her published decades ago in scattered periodicals and books of limited circulation. I've corresponded and visited with curators at Colonial Williamsburg, the Virginia Historical Society and the Muscarelle Museum at William and Mary to see objects in their collections. I've read her will, and checked out everyone who received a bequest from her. I've hounded the poor woman from the cradle to the grave. I know her story now. It is a story with grand moments, but it is a sad story too. Knowing her story makes me feel as if I know her. In her, history comes alive for me. My task is to tell her story so that it comes alive for others too.

Hers is a "passage through time of an ordinary mortal." That is what all of history is about—people and their stories. This is especially true of local history. All of us here share in the privilege of being guardians of our local history heritage. It is a privilege that I see as a great joy, and I hope you share in that joy.
